In the death of John Pierson, the civil engineer, of 167 West Twenty-first street, the inquest on whose body was held yesterday, the police of the West Thirtieth station admit that they have a big mystery to unravel and a murderer to run down.

That Pierson was murdered is admitted, and the evidence goes to show that he was sanbagged.

Up to the present the police have not the slightest clue to his assailant. They have been at work on the case now for over a week, yet they are as much in the dark as ever.
